The Weather for October. A reactionary storm period is in progress at the opening of October, with a combination of astronomic causes centering on the first half of the month that must in all reasonable probability, bring abnormal perturbations. The moon falls on the 2d, rising on the celestial equator at the same date. The probabilities are that the reactionary storms in progress as October comes in will reach their culmination on and touching the 2d. Severe and dangerous tropical storms are indicated for southern parts of the country, with a wide and forceful storm center coming to meet them out of the northwest.

A reactionary storm period is central on the 10th, 11th and 12th. Look at this time for a return of storm conditions—rising temperature, falling barometer and return of cloudiness and autumnal rains and gales. The Venus influence all through this part of October will tend to extremes of temperature, with storms all the way from vicious lightning and thunder to sudden change into almost winter storms and temperatures. These autumnal storm areas will almost certainly bring severe to dangerous disturbances over the northern lakes. Let those concerned note this warning. Renewed high barometer and change to colder will progress eastwardly from about the 11th to the 15th.

A regular storm period covers the 16th to the 20th. In all probability this will prove one of the most severe to dangerous storm periods of this year if not the whole of autumn. Tropical storms, with high barometer and lightning and thunder will be natural on and about the 16th. A these conditions pass eastwardly across the country, many sections will be visited by high to violent gales, all followed by sudden reversion to rising barometer, with snow and marked change to colder over northern sections. Frosts will work into central to southern regions from the 18th and the 22d, or dates touching.

A reactionary storm period is central on the 23d to 25th, at which time change to warmer, falling barometer, with cloudiness and more autumnal rain may be expected. Our agricultural readers should keep all these October periods well in mind. Navigators of the big lakes will pay all reckless disregard for storm warnings. See if they don't!

A regular storm period covers the last five days of the month, embracing the second full moon in October on the 31st and moon on the equator on the 29th. Falling barometer and change to warmer will appear in the west early in this period, storm areas will develop in the same regions, and during the 18th to the 31st wide stretches of cloudiness, rain and snow will pass across the whole country from west to east. The culmination of these storms will probably center on the 31st, on or before which date an early cold wave, with decided dashes of autumnal snow and gales, will be well on their way from the northwest.

LETTER FROM GERMANY.

BERLIN, Sept. 26, 1906. EDITOR STATESMAN:

In order to avoid writing many letters to friends, describing my travels in Germany, I take the liberty to ask you to kindly publish the following, or so much thereof as you may deem to possess any value, in your valuable paper.

My trip across the Atlantic was a most pleasant one. Most of the time the ocean was as quiet as a pond and but little motion could be detected on board. The service on the Hamburg-American Liners is excellent, the bill of fare leaves nothing to be desired and my fellow passengers were, without exception, polite and ready to make friends. We landed on the 21st inst. at Cuxhaven, and immediately upon our setting foot on German soil we were directed to the custom house, where our baggage was examined. This took almost two hours, after which we boarded a railway train which took us to the city of Hamburg. This ride, which lasted about two hours, was the most delightful I ever had the pleasure to undertake. The coaches were of the second class, but fully equal to our American day coach, as far as comfort is concerned. But what made this trip delightful did not exist in the comfortable coach but in the beautiful scenery along the route. The train seems to be moving constantly through a beautiful and well-kept garden. Hundreds of men, women and children could be seen in the fields. The proportion of women doing field work is, according to my observation, about equal to that of men. At least it was so along this route. The highly cultivated patches of ground are everywhere interspersed with flower and vegetable gardens, green hedges, groves of evergreen and deciduous trees, old straw-thatched cabins, apparently hundreds of years old, as well as tile-covered houses of modern construction. No bare ground is seen anywhere, and no rubbish can be detected. A little after 6 o'clock our train pulled into Hamburg. It seems that the average American, who is used to seeing in cities modern business blocks and broad avenues, is entirely bewildered when he gets for the first time in an old German city like Hamburg. This, at least, was my case. The narrow, crooked streets and old buildings are something for which I was not prepared. To find a place by knowing the street and number seemed to me like looking for a lost pin in a straw stack. Luckily, however, I was in the company of a number of friends from our ship, with whom I shared the same hotel and where I spent the evening. The next morning, Sunday, I took a fast train for Berlin, where I arrived at 12:40 p. m. The route from Hamburg to Berlin passes through the Sachsenwald, a beautiful and well kept forest reserve, but the ride along the route, except in a few places, are not in as high a state of cultivation as one along the route from Cuxhaven to Hamburg. On this last-named trip I had the good fortune to get into an excellent company, all men apparently of good standing and refinement. One of them told me I was an American they were eager to listen to my description of American conditions, and they, on the other hand, explained to me much about Germany which heretofore I did not understand. Although the ride had I been four hours, with but one stop, I felt no fatigue. My traveling companions were referred to assisted me to find my sister-in-law and not appear to be at the hotel where I am now staying. Since my arrival I have found that the average German is more polite and open to the stranger than the average American. In the cafes and restaurants, as well as in the street cars, men and women are always anxious to enter into conversation with a stranger, and I always found them attentive and eager listeners.

Since my arrival here, four days ago, I have visited many points of interest. Sunday afternoon my sister-in-law and I visited the "Old Museum," a beautiful building in Greek style. On entering the building we have to our left the "Lustgarten," which is the residence of Frederick William III. in its center. It is a statue of enormous proportions, upon a granite pedestal adorned with allegorical figures. The museum contains principally collections of antiquities. It also contains a picture gallery which illustrates the early Italian school and the Dutch and Flemish schools of the 16th and 17th centuries. Monday forenoon we visited the "Zoo," which bears close resemblance to our Lincoln Park in Chicago, although I think the "Zoo" is more extensive. On the way home we took a look at the Reichstags Gebaude, in front of which stands the statue of Bismark, and with the allegorical figures around it, forms one of the most remarkable monuments of the metropolis. The character of the building is such that a description of it may be worthy of notice. Around the base of the structure are arranged a series of bas-reliefs representing the growth of Germany embodied in the famous "Deutsche Michel." The first shows him as a child tottering on a Goddess to his mother, the Earth; at the second he is lying on a bear skin, at a short distance appear Roman soldiers, while bending over him is a beautiful woman trying to arouse him from sleep; at the back we see Michael running before a triumphant chariot and "Germania" enthroned. The next side represents Bismark crowned with a laurel wreath and the bird of knowledge surrounded by birds of prey. Behind the pedestal is a massive figure of Michael moulding the German sword. In front we see him bearing earth on his shoulders, in typification, as the guide told us, of Germany's expansion in Africa. In one side of the pedestal is Germania with a foot upon a tigress; on the opposite side is Fate, reclining upon the sphinx with a book open before her. I have entered into this description somewhat at length but I have done so for the reason that, of the many statues I have seen here, I consider it the most beautiful.

Today we are going to the Province of Pommern for a stay of several days. During my stay in Berlin I have endeavored to ascertain something of the condition of the laboring class and I shall, probably, give you my views on this subject next week. Hoping that you will find this letter of sufficient interest for publication, I remain Yours truly,

HENRY OBERNORTH.
