ON TIME

"THE late Miss Terry isn't here, I see," said her father, with his usual joke. But her mother frowned in a worried way, saying: "Her dinner will be cold." Then the "late" Miss Terry came in.

"I was finishing up my manuscript," said she, while her mother and father waited patiently for her to catch up.

The telephone bell rang. It was an invitation to the theater, with the request for Miss Terry to come early so as to get all the best first part of the play. Ten minutes after the curtain was due to rise she sauntered off, putting aside her parents' efforts to help by saying that, if hurried, she would be able to write a line the next day. "Come right back afterward," the old people begged as she finally set out.

"We imagine all sorts of accidents when you don't," her mother said. "It was long past midnight when she appeared, to find them sitting up for her.

"The greatest critic in the country was there," burst forth Miss Terry. "And I met her and have an appointment to take some of my poems to her next Monday at five."

All that week the household arranged—or rather disarranged—to suit the temperamental anticipations of the "late" Miss Terry. Then the cook said that she could stand no longer serving meals at all and any hours, and she left. Miss Terry's mother took the cook's place and, after a day, fell ill. Still Miss Terry's work

Your Last Name

IS IT DWIGHT?

IT IS generally agreed that all the Dwights in this country, unless they are of recent migration to these shores, are in some way connected; and that John Dwight of Dedham, Mass., was the father of all the Dwights here. He came to this country in 1634 with his wife, Hannah. They were among the original settlers of Dedham.

The Dwights in Massachusetts have always held prominent place in religion, education and government. A remarkable large number of the family have attained real prominence and few have passed without some sort of distinction. There have been soldiers, Revolutionary and in the Civil war, congressmen, clergymen, philanthropists and scientists. Timothy Dwight, the educator, was one of a branch of the Dwight family that produced 18 or 20 men of unusual distinction within two or three generations.

This name is said, sometimes to be a corruption of Thwaites, a local name in the north country of England. There is a place called Dwight in Cumberland from which some of the names may have come.

Belcher: It is sometimes said that this name is of Norman origin and is derived from Bellecourt. Good authority, however, has it that it is from

Something to Think About

By F. A. WALKER

THE MASKED TOLLMEN

AS WE wind our way through the years, the hidden tollmen along the route are so likely to travel become more and more imperious in their demands and fill our journey with a thousand cares and complexities.

What to us was beautiful five or six years ago has so changed in aspect and general appearance that we can find no pleasure in its presence.

As we leave the old milestones behind we pick up something as we proceed that adds weight to our feet, falling so gradually upon us that we scarcely notice it, but when for some reason we would run, possibly to make haste, we discover that we must stop a while and settle our account with the masked tollmen.

We try to explain that we are not in debt, that we have been punctilious in all our settlements, but when our account is produced we find that we have drawn there heavily, and at our own risk, on previous physical savings we imagined were unimpaired.

There is a little blur in our vision, a slight flutter at the heart and a manifest impatience over trifles, so our tollmen tell us seriously to pay.

We naturally think it will go easier with us if we cancel our obligations graciously, but as a matter of fact it makes no difference.

For as soon as one debt is paid we begin to pile up another; we are never content to live in an atmosphere where risk of life and health is at a minimum, or where we can get wholly away from the humiliating custom of making mortgages.

We continue to find fault with things for which we alone are to blame. Our extravagant habits are continued, though we know they are taking us to and spirit could not bring itself to conform to regular times. And she dispatched an S. O. S. call to Aunt Maria. With Aunt Maria installed in the kitchen, Miss Terry continued unshaken upon the uneven tenor of her way.

At last the great moment arrived. At five-thirty, somewhat past, manuscripts under arm, she rang the bell of the "greatest critic in the country." The door opened and a cold servant announced that his mistress was no longer home to Miss Terry, who had been expected at five.

Quite without understanding, Miss Terry walked back down the steps. Her missing hostess must have had to meet some unexpected emergency. Well, Miss Terry would call next day and find an explanation. But Tuesday the "greatest critic" was again not at home. After two more fruitless visits Miss Terry received a note. In part it read: "Being on time is really a social question, because it involves nearly always some one else. Especially is it a question of mentality, because it involves foresight and self-control. And most of all, and finally, being on time is a habit that can be acquired."

IT MAYBE TAKES A MINUTE

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

IT MAYBE took a minute, friend, for you to send a wire. A little, too, you had to spend, a little of your time. But right across the world it came, across the plains and hills. And here it is, and here's your name, and here the room it fills. With words of love as bright as flame and sweet as whippoorwills.

It maybe took a minute, dear, to write a little line. A letter with a grief was near, was near to me and mine. But right across the world it went, across the lakes and lands. The little letter that you sent is here, within our hands. And, oh, how much your message meant God knows and understands!

It maybe takes a minute, men and women here and there. To stop a little now and then our happiness to share. But right across the world it goes, a word, a look, a smile. Through summer sun and winter snows it travels many a mile. And helps more hearts than you suppose that need it all the while!

SOUPS WITHOUT MEAT

THE following soups are especially good for the members of the family who are not eating much meat:

Cream of Carrot Soup.
Scrape six small carrots, cut into small pieces, add one small onion, two stalks of celery and two sprigs of parsley. Cover with one quart of boiling water and bring to a rapid boil, cooking for ten minutes, then place in a fireless cooker for two to three hours, depending upon the carrots. Rub through a coarse sieve, add two tablespoonsful each of flour and butter cooked together, to one pint of hot milk; cook until well-blended. Add salt and pepper and serve hot, with a pinch of mace.

Cream of Lima Bean Soup.
The baby limas seem to cook much quicker than the larger kind. Take two cupsful of the beans and cover with water, allowing them to stand

Knitted Shawls in Fashion; Hats for the Southland

IF YOUR calendar is filled with dates for dinner, dance, grand opera and other social functions such as make merry the midwinter months, then it needs not follow that you are interested in shawls. Not ordinary shawls, goodness no! but shawls, gorgeous, graceful and exquisitely wrought, the sort which bespeak fashion in her most prepossessing mood. Perhaps, rather than wintering in the lands of the North, you have chosen to

Great enthusiasm prevails for the knitted fabric, to be worn over a satin drop skirt, preferably black satin. There is a tendency toward captivating oriental colorings and design. Vivid color notes add to the fascination of these below-the-knee length blouses. Powder-blue, scarlet, bright green and henna are outstanding color favorites. Those who are lucky enough to journey from lands of snow to lands of sun must be hatted to suit their southern under Southern palms where existence is mostly a matter of recreation and smart costume. In planning one's wardrobe for North, South, East or West, for evening attire the shawl beautiful registers as "first aid" to feminine charm.

Fashioned boasts nothing lovelier than the new knitted shawls. Knit-craft rises to artistic heights when it comes to these lovely shawls, delicate as silken cobweb and it colors most entrancing. The handiwork among these knitted shawl types are their exquisite patterns with huge flower designs hand-painted in various exotic lines. The picture tells the story of the knitted shawl, whose long, graceful fringe adds a touch of surpassing grace.

Speaking of hand-painting as applied to things knitted, it is a combination greatly approved by the mode. Espe-environment. If they are to be long in one place they will need an assortment, but if they belong to the army who spend most of their time touring they get along with two or three. These must be a bit summary—but not too summary—headwear that will look all right for early spring.

A group of hats of this character is shown here and they foretell something of the modes now being prepared for spring, emphasizing the new crowns and the variety in brim lines. The hat at the top, made of black straw cloth (which looks much like a lustrous crepe silk, but is not) is a literal translation of French ideas. It has a massive crown and a graceful and becoming brim that rolls up at the front. But where the Paris original probably places the trimming right on top, it is a little less saucy posed at the back of the crown. The severity of the beehive crown has been tamed by a fold across the top and in the side crown. The pretty cut-out felt at the left is wearable almost any time and almost any place. The cut-out design is underlaid with silk, often in a contrasting shade, as when a beige felt reveals a flame colored underlay. The brim in this model is cut away at the cially interesting are painted designs applied to a knitted woolen background, brushed after the pattern is executed, so that an attractive all-over pattern is produced.

In fact, this is a season when knit-wear is being touched up with unique embellishment, embroidery, fur, leather or as well as hand-painting all contributing to effectiveness. Then there are cunning manipulations of yarn, such as loopstitching, trimming plain knit, also self-fringed effects, simulations of fur, inter-knittings of silk with wool or introduction of glittering metal threads.

back and folded toward the front or the side where the flat, feathery ornament is posed.

At the right a close-fitting caplike shape supports a tucked silk drape extended into wings at the sides. A long ornament poses at the front is a promising feature for spring. The last hat is a pretty silk affair. On the upturned brim and silk wings narrow braid is stitched, on edge, in an all-over pattern. Wider braid is applied to the crown in a floral motif.

Geranium and Cherry Tones
Among the colors of the season are deep rich tones of geranium and cherry. These are particularly effective when chosen for evening wear. Several of the latest frocks are of chiffon or velvet in these shades and are delicately beaded in crystal.

Frocks of Shaded Crepe
New and unusually lovely are simple plaited frocks fashioned of silk that shades from pale to deep tones. They make the most intriguing dance frocks and have already scored a pronounced success.

Headdress for Bride
The headdress favored by brides is a high, crownlike affair of wired lace and pearls. It is of the same height all the way across the front.

Coats of Gay Plaid
The newest coats for crisp days are of plaid with huge collars and cuffs of fur. Quite often the fur continues down the front of the coat to the hem. The plaids are very gay.

Red Indian Chosen as Canadian Solon
Ludger Bassin, a member of the Huron tribe and the first Indian to be elected to the Quebec legislature, was the by-election for the conservatives in Quebec county by defeating the Liberal candidate, E. Bedard, whose party has been 27 years in power in the ancient capital, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Mr. Bassin's father was head chief of all the Hurons of Canada for a term of office. He himself is a man of wealth. He operates a large tannery business at Lorette, a well-known Indian settlement. Some years ago when the city of Quebec interfered with the water supply of his tanneries he carried a legal action for damages to the city council and won an award of $200,000. He is a director of numerous enterprises.

The Change
"Court week hasn't nuthin' like it used to be in the good old times," grumbled Uncle Heck Razum of Piddle Creek. "Nowdays it don't begin till Tuesday and quits business as a gin'er's rule on Friday, and except when there's a specially spicy case on hand, there ain't nuthin' skurried to keep a feller awake. But when I was a young feller it was a lot different. Court opened at nine o'clock Monday morning, and continued plumb till sundown Saturday evening. And all the time there was loss swapping a little dramming and a whole helva lot of lighting, from the beginning of the session plumb to the end. But now—ah, Lawd!"—Kansas City Star.

Club Bait for Ice Fishing
These husky little chub minnows are the fishermen's delight. Here you will obtain some of the right length (an inch and a half) that tapered thick to the tail and yet are as active as you could possibly want them. Some of these are almost black in color, others of a lighter shade, says Outing Magazine. There are also shiner minnows—but shiners taken from almost any water are exceedingly tender of flesh and are unable to stand any injury, so they are very poor as lures. The minnow that is the liveliest and that will hold on longest is the minnow that is most sought for and that is the chub.

His Ability
"Ah, how the lady has grown!" chinned the presiding elder. "No doubt he is able to take care of himself pretty well!"
"I reckon so," replied Gap Johnson of Rumpus Ridge. "I ain't paid no special attention lately, though, but I heard wife say something tuther evening about the little cuss being able to crawl outdoors and entertain himself tolfable well by smearing soft soap and ashes in his hair, and such as—saw-saw-w-w-w—that."—Kansas City Star.

The Truant Soul

DOCTOR AND NURSE

Now Joan could see his face and, to her astonishment, it did not bear the expression of the smiling busy man she had seen that morning. Yet of the man who had addressed another man in such terms as one might use to a slave. It was not an unusual sight that of a sick man. For a moment she remembered the operating theater, of the gasolene that seemed to transform the man, as if he possessed a dual personality.

"I am Miss Wentworth," she explained. "I came to ask if you would reconsider your decision to sign my name. I always wanted to be a nurse, and I am sure, apart from my own interests, I want to graduate to be able to help others. Won't you give me another opportunity?"

Here are hero and heroine. The reader who wants mystery, plot, action and a real love story can get it here in "The Truant Soul." It is a story of dual personality of an impulsive girl who is a nurse, and a man who is a doctor. The material incident the best wife as well as the best nurse. Can a victim of the morbid be permanently cured? These are questions the reader asks himself as he reads.

The author is Victor Rousseau, whose many stories of American life have given him a large public.

Chapter I

"I let him see I wouldn't stand for any language like that, and I reckon he understood, even if I didn't have to say much," remarked the dark-haired girl to Joan Wentworth. "It doesn't seem to have occurred to Doctor Lancaster yet that a nurse is a human being under her uniform."

"If he'd treat us half as nicely as he treats some of his lady friends," she added, in a suggestive tone that changed into the accentuation of ordinary speech under Joan's discouraging look. "I've seen him driving them round town nights in his auto, and I've never seen the same one twice. I guess he takes it out on us when they've been mean to him."

Joan did not answer her. She was watching the head surgeon as he came into the operating theater. At his entrance the general buzz of conversation ceased, as if the utterance of words had been cut off with a knife. The students on the benches settled themselves in their places and craned their heads forward intently. The two assistant surgeons, Ivers and MacPherson, assumed attitudes of constraint, for everybody was constrained in Lancaster's presence. The orderly, who had been peering through the crack of the swinging door into the anaesthetic room, where the head nurse was holding the patient's wrist and watching the face beneath the mask, intently brightened himself and stood up in military fashion. Only the visiting doctors seemed at their ease as they advanced to shake hands with Joan Lancaster.

They had come from several neighboring cities, drawn by the news that Lancaster was to perform his famous operation of arterial excision, which was just then the subject of discussion in the medical press. Plenty of surgeons had tried to remove a section of one of the larger blood vessels, but only Lancaster had succeeded in bringing down the mortality to 15 per cent.

Lancaster was something of a mystery both to his colleagues and to the nursing staff. The Lancaster fund supported the Southern hospital, and John Lancaster was firmly established as the head of the institution. The head of surgery, which existed according to the terms laid down in his father's will, had apparently no advisory capacity, and it was supplied and plastic in Lancaster's hands. And John Lancaster was more feared and admired than any doctor in the country.

Fearing by most for his tyranny, admired by a very few on account of his extraordinary skill, he seemed to have a dual personality. The man whose life was the standard of the conservative little southern town, who was respected by the better families, whose frequent appearances in the hospital were usually the occasion for applause, storms and dismissals, changed in the operating theater into a man whose gentleness and humility and skill made him adored for the time by all who came into contact with him. But it was only rarely that a case occurred that required his attention.

On such occasions his manner was in itself remarkable. He would step stealthily into his private room, dress there, and emerge masked like a mummy to perform his miracle almost in silence, and afterward to make his escape in a way suggestive of his having performed some shameful act.

So much Joan Wentworth had heard. Naturally she watched his entrance on this, her first day of surgical work, with absorbed interest. But Lancaster came in unmasked, and Joan could distinguish nothing of his face or of the self-satisfied smile or the brisk manner in which he greeted the visiting surgeons.

He looked a man of seven or eight and thirty, and he bore his years heavily. The eyes were lined and a little sunken; the features, which Joan had seen only a few times during her eighteen months of work at the hospital, interested, as they had always done, a rather repellent effect upon the girl. The face was eminently earnest and hard. Nevertheless the man obviously dominated the assembly.

He dominated her. She was much more afraid of some nervous lapse in Lancaster's presence than of seeing the use of the knife. The hissing of the steam tank, the nervous movements of the spectators upon the benches, whose heads seemed to swing with a uniform and rhythmical motion, the deepening sense of constraint, acted upon her with a sort of hypnotic effect not lessened by Lancaster's decisive manner.

She pulled the tray of instruments out of the boiling water and set it down upon the table by the side of the bicarbonate solution. Lancaster, who had been pulling on his rubber gloves, came to her side and plucked both hands into the antiseptic fluid. There was a look of self-conscious satisfaction upon his face, and Joan thought that every gesture and each movement was designed to impress the visitors. Presently she became sure of it. The man was acting. A feeling of disgust came over her.

Lancaster cast a quick glance at Joan.

"New nurse?" he asked.

"My first morning of surgical work, Doctor Lancaster," she answered.

"He granted in a contemptuous sort of way. Joan flushed to the hair. He turned to the other girl.

"You there!" he shouted. "Look alive with those sponges!" And he cast a quick glance toward the visitors, as if to see whether they appreciated his harshness.

A look of alarm came over the dark-haired girl's face, but she ran to obey and dropped the wet sponges into the bicarbonate with shaking fingers. At the same moment the swing door opened and the stretcher with the patient appeared, wheeled by the orderly. Behind it walked the head nurse, still maintaining her crouching attitude as she moved. The stretcher stopped inside the theater, and the head nurse and orderly lifted the man who lay upon it on the glass table.

He numbed and tried to raise himself. The nurse put her hands about his shoulders, pressing them down, while the orderly held the body, protesting against the indignity about to be offered to it, to which it had emphatically not consented, whatever arrangement had been decreed by the brain. Lancaster's harsh voice boomed through the theater: "That's no way to bring a patient here, Miss Symons! Deep anesthesia!"

The head nurse lifted her face for an instant. "There's a history of nephritis, Doctor Lancaster," she said.

"The pulse is 150, and Doctor MacPherson said—"

"Who's running this business?" shouted Lancaster, striding toward her; and Joan was sure that he looked out of the corner of his eye toward the visitors.

He snatched the green ether bottle out of the nurse's hand and poured a quantity of the fluid upon the mask. The struggle ceased, the man sighed deeply, and his limbs relaxed. The numbing stretch of the ether fumes made Joan's head reel. It seemed to fill the theater. Miss Symons, flushing, but displaying no resentment, took the bottle from Lancaster's hand and resumed her position, holding the patient's wrist and peering into his face, the green bottle upraised.

The girl who was in charge of the sponges whispered bitterly to her: "He doesn't know how to treat a woman—not a lady. He isn't our kind. My! he must have been on a terrible racket night!" He can't keep up that gait much longer unless he gives up his work here."

Joan ignored her; she had concentrated all her attention upon Lancaster's probable demands; she was resolved not to be found wanting. It was said that Lancaster was absolutely merciless and had ruined many a girl's career by refusing to allow her to complete her graduating course. He was tyrannical, overlooked nothing, and never appreciated good work. Rumor went that when a certain nurse had once handed him benzine instead of alcohol he had taken her by the shoulders and run her bodily out of the hospital, forbidding her to show her face there again.

"He can't last long if he leads that sort of life," the dark-haired girl repeated. "You'd think he'd be old enough to have learned how to pretend to be a gentleman even if he isn't one."

Joan shook her off mentally as one chases away a persistent fly. For the tenth time she counted the instruments in the tray. Lancaster picked up a scalpel, and MacPherson and Ivers took up their positions, one on either side of him. The operation was beginning.

The visiting surgeons watched with an occasional whispered remark. The assistants already were snapping the little forceps upon the ends of the divided arteries. Lancaster issued his commands from time to time, without looking back:

"Sponges!"

"One—two," whispered the dark-haired girl. "Three—four—five."

"History. Scissors. Dilator. Number four Simms."

Joan never faltered. She felt easier in her mind, her quick hands found the instruments in the tray the moment Lancaster demanded them. Meanwhile the dark-haired girl never ceased counting the sponges: "Six—seven—eight—nine—"

Suddenly Lancaster stopped, wheeled and turned fiercely upon her. "For God's sake, stop that chatter!" he cried.

The girl let a sponge fall, snatched it up, and shot an apprehensive glance at him. Joan saw that she was losing her nerve in spite of her brave talk of a few minutes before. It was the critical time of a very dangerous and difficult process. She tried to pull herself together.

Yet, without looking up, she realized that a sense of general apprehension had stolen through the operating theater. The nurse at the head of the table, looking like a veiled Vestal, had not shifted her position since the beginning of the operation, except that from time to time her hand shifted slightly as she let one or two drops of ether fall upon the mask. MacPherson and Ivers stirred busily, their heads bent level with their chief's as they moved to and fro at their work. The patient began to mutter. Then a hand, upraised in weak protest, struck a clasp from Ivers' fingers. It fell upon the floor.

"Keep him quiet, Miss Symons, confound you!" shouted Lancaster.

"Doctor Lancaster, the pulse—" she began. But, after a quick glance at the head surgeon, she shrugged her shoulders, tilted the bottle, and deliberately poured out nearly all the ether remaining in it. The renewed stench of the anesthetic filled the room. Joan saw the benches swing, the craning faces seemed to become multiplied; Lancaster and the two assistants, the visiting surgeons were, they seemed, an immense distance away, surrounding a tiny table on which a doll-like figure lay extended. She tried to bring them back into focus, but could not; and, what was worse, she felt that she had lost her nurse's sense of divining the surgeon's requirements before he gave expression to them.

The feeling of suspense was growing. Something was wrong, and although nothing had been said, even the students on the top row of benches farthest from the table were aware of it. The assistant doctors appeared as busy as ever, and yet they seemed at a loss, and once or twice looked up at Lancaster as if his technique was puzzling them. Joan saw two of the visiting surgeons exchange brief glances, one with inquiry, the other, answering, with uplifted eyebrows.

Once Lancaster stopped; he resumed his work, stopped again, and stood staring at his work. Then he wheeled round upon Joan, the upper part of his body seeming to move upon a pivot, while his lower limbs remained stationary.

This is certainly a bad beginning for both hero and heroine—surgeon and nurse. What next?

Showing Wiring Diagram of Receiver Known as the Heteroflex. All Parts Except Tuning Transformer Are Standard Make.

By HENRY F. WORTNER

Simplicity of tuning, elimination of extraneous noises and a minimum number of tuning controls are what the radio fan of today is looking for in the line of receiving sets. The set about to be described was designed and built by the writer, and if properly constructed will do all these things.

The hookup consists essentially of an untuned primary circuit, a secondary circuit shunted by a 25-plate (00015 mfd.) variable condenser and a third circuit made up of a 0.005 mfd. condenser connected in series with a coil. The wiring diagram of this receiver, which is known as the heteroflex, will be found accompanying this article. All parts except the tuning transformer are of standard make.

For the details of construction of this transformer, known as the heteroflex, Figs. 1 and 2 will be self-explanatory. The tubing may be of some standard material, such as radion, or any other compound. The holes are drilled exactly as shown in the diagram. All three inductances are wound on the same form in such a way that the largest winding acts as a spacing for the windings of the remaining two coils, which incidentally space the winding of the large coil.

The materials required for the construction of this coil are as follows:

An insulating tube three inches in diameter and three inches long.

One-half pound of No. 24 D. S. C. wire.

One-half pound of No. 26 D. S. C. wire.

In winding the coil both spools of wire are slipped over two twenty-penny nails driven into a board which acts as a support. The form is drilled for the terminals, three on each end, a quarter of an inch from the edge and about an inch or so apart. Two mounting holes also are drilled at each end for mounting the finished product to the condensers. Opposite each terminal hole a small hole is drilled a half-inch from the edge to accommodate the wire. The primary consists of nine turns of the No. 24 wire and is connected to the aerial and ground. The coil is on the right of the form. Next in order is the secondary, which is made up of 43 turns of No. 26 wire and is wound for a space of two inches across the form. The third coil is wound in between the secondary coil and adjacent to the primary. It consists of 27 turns of No. 24 wire.

To wind the coil described place one end of the No. 24 wire in the small hole near the larger one labeled 1, in Fig. 1, and one end of the No. 26 wire through the small hole near 2. Commence winding both wires in the same wound in between the secondary coil and adjacent to the primary. It consists of 27 turns of No. 24 wire.

Socket Mounting Plan Will Eliminate Noises

Dry cell tubes, such as the UV100 and the WD12, are often very sensitive to shocks and jars, and as a result loud ringing noises are heard in the earphones or loud speaker. To obviate this trouble the tube sockets need only be mounted on some absorbent material like sponge rubber. The end of the binding posts should be made with flexible wire, as ordinary stiff bus bars act as a conductor of the disturbances too well.

Switch Blade Stop

An excellent switch stop can be made from an ordinary soldering lug. These may be procured either in plain copper finish or tinned. The tinned type will look better when used with nickel-plated switch points. Cut the two tapes of the ends of the soldering lug and place the lug underneath the last switch points. Tighten up the nut and bend the lug arm up. It will protrude just far enough above the print,

When Using Loop Antenna

To get good results out of a loop antenna a set should be used that is designed especially for this purpose. Such a receiver contains from one to three or more stages of radio-frequency amplification. For loud speaker operation, then, at least four or five tubes should be used, unless the receiver is of the reflex variety, in which the tubes do double duty.

Large Gauge Wire Advantage

The efficiency of a radio-frequency circuit increases with the use of a large gauge wire. Tuning coils should be wound with wire not smaller than No. 20 gauge. For the primary coil larger wire, No. 18 gauge, may be used to advantage.

Soldering Flux

An excellent soldering flux may be made by dissolving one ounce of rosin in one ounce of alcohol. This mixture should be kept in a bottle with a tight-fitting cork. After soldering a joint wipe off excess soldering flux with a rag dipped in alcohol.

A. O. LEONARD, INC. TO BE HAD IN NEW YORK

OUR BIG JANUARY CLEARANCE SALE IS NOW ON

Every Day in January is a Bargain Day at Our Store

Reductions in All Departments---Big Savings for You

We expect to increase our volume of Sales considerably during 1925, and to do this we must show you a SAVING in Dollars and Cents, by trading at Our Store. We will have specials from time to time, and it will pay you to visit us often, not to miss them. You will find by comparison that our prices throughout the store are lower than elsewhere, considering quality. The more we sell, the more we can save you. So Let's Work Together, stronger than ever, and both be the gainer.
